FUND MANAGER COMMENTARY

2022 was difficult for investors as both equity and fixed income asset classes ended the year firmly in the negative. Over the year markets continued to be influenced by inflation and the consequential aggressive interest rate increases by central banks, recessionary fears, and the Russian invasion of Ukraine.

In December, the Fed kept its hawkish stance despite signals that inflation was slowing down in the US (but remains well above central bank expectations). The bond market continued to indicate the likelihood of a recession in 2023 as a result of the inverted yield curve, slow consumer spending, and weak manufacturing orders. European inflation appeared to have peaked but also remains well above the European Central Bank's targets. The Eurozone remains in recession territory, however data indicating that the recession will not be as deep as initially envisaged began to abate some fears over December.

Global equity markets in December were led by China (but it remained the worst performing region for the year). North American markets lagged in December with the US proving to be one of the weakest. Emerging markets and small cap stocks also both lost ground in the month but continued to outperform broader market indices.

As we start 2023, markets will continue to try to ascertain whether we are heading for a hard or soft landing in regard to a recession. A hard landing would suggest that central banks will struggle to bring inflation under control. In such case, interest rates will continue to rise, placing additional pressure on consumer spending, investment, and ultimately business earnings. If inflation declines to a tolerable level allowing central banks to stop raising rates, the soft-landing scenario is more likely to take place. Although GDP growth may drop to close to zero, economic growth rates would mostly likely rebound shortly thereafter.
